CEO INSIDER Student Spotlight - Riley Beavers

In CEO 104 Jenna taught us that there are opportunities presented all the time. “Even if you doubt yourself, or think the job is below your level, take it. You’ll still learn something from the experience.” I took that message to heart, and have started looking for these opportunities. This past spring, I took one of the best risks ever - I went to Scandinavia. No, not to party or sail ships, but rather to study International Business with BC.

In Scandinavia, we researched and learned about green technology, studying the daily business practices of electric vehicles, and why a higher portion of Scandinavian populations invest in green tech, in comparison to the US. While I could bore you with the details of the VAT [Value Added Tax], instead I’ll tell you how taking this opportunity has changed the course of my education.

After the research trip I realized that I wanted to focus my higher education on International Business and Entrepreneurship, my specialties. Soon after the trip I had the opportunity to attend NCCWSL [National Conference for College Women Student Leaders] with the OWLs, a leadership club at BC. At the conference I was able to apply both what I had learned from CEO and abroad while networking with various other student leaders and Graduate schools in attendance. Stemming from these conversations I made connections and met people I never thought possible, such as connecting with the senior staff from LinkedIn, and meeting Tarana Burke, founder of the #metoo campaign. All of these experiences and those to come are thanks to this simple advice from CEO. Don’t pass up on any opportunity, even if you feel underqualified. Qualifications come from taking calculated risks, so take them.

So what would I like you to remember about all this? If there is an opportunity available, take it - whether it’s meeting a new person, or attending a conference. If you can make it happen, there will most likely be a positive effect. One of the best opportunities is available right here and now. CEO. The advisors, the program, and the free education - this is one of the best and most life-changing opportunities I have ever stumbled upon, and you’re already involved. Start talking to your instructors and your Case Managers. Use your resources! They won’t let you down.
